Random Videochat

While it's only available to iPad, iPhone, and Mac users, Apple's FaceTime video chat app has an intuitive interface and excellent quality. However, other players in the video chat market such as Fring, Oovoo, Skype, and Tango can make face-to-face calls to Android and Apple devices, and some can conduct multi-party video calls with four or more people. So should Apple fans stick to FaceTime exclusively, or should they opt for other apps that open up communication to more users?Set upBecause the iPad 2 and iPod touch don't have phone numbers, FaceTime works differently on them than on the iPhone 4. On those devices, FaceTime is a standalone, pre-installed application. For the iPhone 4, FaceTime works as a feature within the Phone and Contacts apps.On the iPhone, you'll need to activate FaceTime in the phone settings before making any video calls. You'll also want to remember to turn on Wi-Fi since FaceTime doesn't work on AT&T or Verizon's 3G networks. For the iPod Touch and iPad 2, a FaceTime application is added to the home screen by default.The next step in the process is to set up an Apple ID (if one hasn't been set up already). You'll need the e-mail address associated with it to log into FaceTime and make calls. After the first sign-in, users are prompted to enter their Apple ID and password. Then, if needed, users can enter another separate e-mail address that other callers can use to find them.User InterfaceOn the iPhone 4, FaceTime works much like making a phone call. When you pull up a contact with an active FaceTime account, FaceTime appears with options to text, call, or e-mail that person. You can also switch a voice phone call to FaceTime via a large button overlaid on the screen during active calls.Click to enlargeFor the iPod touch and iPad 2, launching the FaceTime application activates the front-facing camera immediately, so your own first-person video takes up the entire screen. A list of FaceTime contacts is transparently overlaid on the right side of the display and allows users to make calls by tapping a contact's name.FaceTime's interface is the same regardless of the device. The other caller's video occupies the full screen and a thumbnail window for first-person video sits in the corner. Tapping the display pulls up a menu of on-screen buttons for muting the microphone, switching between the front- and back-facing cameras, and ending calls.In typical Apple fashion, the controls are elegantly simple. For instance, the small thumbnail of the video feed can be dragged or flicked from one corner to another with your finger, and when your caller switches from the back camera to the front one or vice versa, the video feed actually revolves around to indicate to the other caller what's happening. When this action happens in each of the other video chat applications, the video feed simply freezes for a split second before it reappears jarringly with different video. Apple's solution to that admittedly small glitch adds a bit of cool to FaceTime.Call QualityRegardless of the device we used--an iPad 2, iPhone 4, and a 13.3-inch MacBook Air--FaceTime offered some of the most dependable video quality we've seen. We experienced no dropped calls, laggy signals, or out-of-sync video and audio. That's because FaceTime only works over Wi-Fi, which tends to be more stable for video connections than 3G data networks. Still, the option to make video calls, even of slightly poorer quality, wouldn't hurt. Google Chat, Fring, ooVoo, Skype, and Tango each work over 3G and 4G data networks as well as Wi-Fi.Calls made to the iPhone 4 from another iPhone 4 were clear at a glance, but a deeper look revealed that they contained some pixel noise. The edges of our face looked only slightly less blurry than on video calls made with Skype and Tango, but it was much better than Oovoo, which struggled over Wi-Fi. Calls made from the MacBook Air to the iPhone 4 and the iPad 2 video looked clean, but the edges were still fuzzy.The worst picture quality we noticed was while calling an iPad 2 from an iPhone 4. The latest iPhone captures video that's fine for another iPhone's 3.5-inch display. The iPad 2's 9.7-inch display must scale up video from the iPhone's camera, and the result is scratchy, pixelated video on the tablet's screen.Still, FaceTime delivered solid video connections, and the audio was the best of any app we tested for this roundup. There was almost no latency, and the sound quality was so clear we hardly ever missed a word.Special FeaturesUnlike other video chat apps, FaceTime doesn't offer special features such as group video chat or free voice-only calls made over a carrier's data network. Fring allows users to make up to four video calls at once, and ooVoo Mobile can host up to six audio calls with a single, shared video feed. Plus, Google Chat for mobile, Fring, ooVoo, Skype, and Tango each offer free voice-only calls to other users, and Fring, ooVoo, and Skype even offer pre-paid calls to international numbers.VerdictWhile FaceTime's functionality is limited--Apple devices only, Wi-Fi only, no group video chat--what it does, it does very well. Not only is it easy to set up and use, but FaceTime also offers some of the cleanest video calls, and audio quality was superior. For Apple users looking to make video calls to other Apple users, there's no better app than FaceTime. Browsing on dating apps can be fun, but the chat box can also be intimidating. How much is too much small talk? What's a good way to make your intentions clear without being too direct? How long do you have to keep up the digital banter before you can just go on a damn date?The answers are different for everyone, but there's some guidance to be found about how long to chat pre-meetup, at least.This process is different for everyoneSteph Nazi, a 26-year-old New Yorker who's used Hinge in the past, is "never worried about meeting up too fast."She says she'll talk to someone on the app for a week or so before diving into an in-person date, and she thinks that's plenty of time to determine if someone is a safety hazard for her. "If they can joke and be funny, then 'potential murderer' is crossed off the list," she said, adding she's even met up in shorter timespans than that.You're allowed to drag out the text-relay stage as long as you want! Hell, you don't ever even have to meet up if you don't want to. Just don't be surprised if the other person's intentions or interests don't align with yours.G/O Media may get a commissionShe's "leaning more toward consistency" and isn't interested in one-time flings, so face-to-face interaction helps her identify people who have potential and avoid wasting time chatting with people who don't.That's the case for one person, but you might be the opposite, looking for a quick hookup with little interest in getting to know someone. As long as you make that clear and take the right safety precautions, you can meet up the same day you match with someone. There's no rule that says you can't.On the other hand, you might be into text-based chit-chat and value the ability to hold a conversation like that with a partner. You might be nervous about your safety, hesitant to jump back into dating after a long-term relationship or the pandemic, or just busy. You're allowed to drag out the text-relay stage as long as you want! Hell, you don't ever even have to meet up if you don't want to. Just don't be surprised if the other person's intentions or interests don't align with yours. Ghosting is never cool, but people have been unmatched for less.Evaluate your comfort and safetyKate MacLean, a relationship expert who works with Plenty of Fish, said you should consider your safety and wellbeing when planning a possible meeting with a dating site match."The important thing is to go with your gut and meet in a public place if you're comfortable and ready," she said.Let's be real here. It's not unheard of for a particularly spontaneous person to schedule a meet at someone's home or plan to carpool to a date. Most of us have friends who've done this, if we haven't done it ourselves. But just because you know someone who made it out of a spontaneous meetup safely doesn't necessarily mean it'll work out perfectly for you. We can't advise you to do something like that in good conscience, no matter how long you've been chatting on an app. If a date is worth it, they'll understand you concerns. If they protest, move on to the next match.If you still plan to, have a safety plan in place. Text details about the other person to your friends and tell them exactly where you're going, as well as what time you plan to leave. Snap a photo of the person's license plate and forward it to your most trusted pals. Share your location with them using Find My Friends, Snapchat, or another app. Whatever it takes to prioritize your safety, do that. In fact, do all that stuff even if you're meeting in public. If a date is worth it, they'll understand you concerns. If they protest, move on to the next match.Advance the connection incrementallyYou don't have to stick with the app's chat feature. Steph gives her phone number to matches after about five exchanges on a dating app. If you're comfortable giving out your number, texting could be a slightly more intimate way to communicate. Remember, though, that your number is tied to you pretty closely. Reverse searches can bring up more personal information about you than you might realize, and even your area code is a clear indication of where you're from. Consider a third-party texting app like Google Voice if giving out your real number makes you a little nervous.You can also connect on social media. Add each other on Snapchat or follow each other on Instagram, so you can chat there and get a peek into each other's lives before meeting face-to-face. Seeing how someone presents themselves on their socials is a great way to feel out if you'll actually vibe."Over the past few years, dating rules and norms have evolved dramatically," MacLean said, citing a 2020 survey of 1,500 POF members. "The pandemic led to the rise of virtual dating, with 60% of singles reporting they are more comfortable video chatting with a match now than before COVID-19. With the rise of video dating, singles now have the opportunity to 'vet' people more thoroughly before meeting IRL, so this is a great option for those with busy schedules or who may be a little timid about meeting a stranger for the first time. It also makes first dates less awkward!"Most importantly, do what feels natural and safe to you. Don't let anyone pressure you into meeting up or giving out your social media handles if you're not into it. If someone is making you feel uncomfortable, unmatch them and move on. If you haven't noticed, there are plenty more people on the apps. One of them will have an ideal timeline that matches up with yours, and having one thing in common before you meet up is always a good sign.
